HOMES AND REAL ESTATE NEWS

THE HINDU

COVER

ill last month, P.S. Mahesh, promoter of Banyan Tree Estates, marketed his DTCP-approved seven-acre villa plot layout at Pudupattu village near Sunguvarchatram in Kancheepuram district as an investment offering a “100% profit guarantee”, banking on its proximity to the proposed Parandur greenfield airport.

But this month, the social media promotions for his company’s layout do not mention the word ‘Parandur’ anywhere in them. Instead, they just mention “Buy your land near Sunguvarchatram”.

That’s because the ruling Tamilaga Vettri Kazhagam (TVK) government has almost given up on the proposed ₹27,400-crore Parandur greenfield airport project. The government’s stand is in line with the party’s stand to support the locals who are against the proposed airport, as it would affect several water bodies across 13 villages. The State government now feels there is not enough vacant space to build a runway without affecting the waterbodies, and hence it is not pushing ahead with the proposed airport.

As a result, realtors in the region have no option left but to stop promoting their projects.

“Parandur airport was a big opportunity for growth for real estate investors. Without that, there is a slowdown,” says Mahesh. For instance, his Aerovilla project at Pudupattu village near Sunguvarchatram was seeing a ₹50 to ₹100 per sq.ft. price appreciation every month until May this year. After the Assembly election results and with a new government, there has been no appreciation in prices due to the general apprehension about the future of the Parandur airport project.

“While the price per sq. ft should have moved to around ₹1,500 per sq. ft by now, we are still quoting the same ₹1,300 per sq. ft that was prevailing a couple of months ago. Layouts closer to the existing Chennai-Bengaluru National Highway continue to command around ₹2,500 per sq. ft,” says Mahesh.

He also adds that earlier, there used to be several enquiries daily; now they are down to a trickle, thereby indicating a slowdown in the Parandur region.

“There are enough factories in the region, including Samsung, Dell and Foxconn as well as other infrastructure projects such as Dry Port at Mappedu, the Chennai Peripheral Road connecting Mamallapuram to Minjur and the new Chennai-Bengaluru expressway to take care of long-term growth,” he says.

Drop in land prices

If market sources are to be believed, there has been roughly a 30% drop in land prices in the region. (While land is measured in acres, developed layouts are sold on a per sq. ft basis.) “A correction in land prices is a natural consequence when a major infrastructure trigger is withdrawn. However, it would be inappropriate to assign a uniform percentage decline across the entire Parandur region, as

PARANDUR

Beyond the runway

Chennai’s second airport uncertainty cools prices, slows demand and forces developers to reposition projects around industrial growth

Eco-concerns in the region

- Requires 5,300 acres across 13 villages for the airport
- The project will impact several waterbodies located in the region
- Chengalpeta, Kancheepuram, Thiruvallur districts have the most lakes and ponds in the region
- These waterbodies help in flood mitigation as they allow water gradation and excess water to flow into the sea through channels and rivers
- Constructing the airport and a large runway would mean interfering with these waterbodies and that will lead to environmental disaster, feel the locals every micro-market behaves differently,” says Sanjay Chugh, city head and director, Anarock Property Consultants Pvt. Ltd, Chennai.

Areas where prices had risen sharply on speculation are likely to witness a steeper correction, while locations supported by industrial activity and existing infrastructure may experience relatively moderate adjustments. The market will eventually stabilise once prices align with prevailing demand and long-term development prospects, Chugh adds.

Over the past few years, several developers and plotted development companies have launched projects in the broader Parandur-Sriperumbudur-Kancheepuram corridor. These include G Square Realtors, Urban Tree Sameera Lands & Construction, DRA, StepStone, Premier Housing & Properties, GTK Foundations, VGN, ABI Estates and JR Properties, among others. Most of these projects were launched across the growth corridor rather than immediately adjoining the proposed airport site.

“The announcement of a large infrastructure project like an airport will surely result in a substantial increase in land prices in that region. While investors who moved in early would be alright, those who got in at a later stage may be stuck,” says Mehul Doshi, president, CREDAI Chennai.

nai. Ironically, the proposed Sriperumbudur airport, announced in 2006, was also abandoned, and Parandur now appears to be headed down a similar path. Around that time, Mumbai-based Hiranandani launched a large residential township in Oragadam, while the UAE-based ETA Group developed an SEZ-cum-residential township near Sunguvarchatram, anticipating stronger demand from the proposed airport. The projects were completed, but the airport never materialised.

“It has been 20 years, and still there is no airport. Normally, it takes seven to eight years for any greenfield airport to come up. And that means Chennai is stuck with its existing inadequate airport for almost another 10 years at least. This is at a time when other cities like Bengaluru and Hyderabad are overtaking Chennai in terms of airport infrastructure, and Bengaluru is even talking about a second airport beyond the existing one,” Doshi adds.

According to Chugh, investors who entered the market solely on the airport growth story may have to recalibrate their investment horizons. Distress selling may not be the most prudent approach unless liquidity is an immediate concern. Developers, on the other hand, will need to reposition their projects by highlighting the region’s proximity to the Sriperumbudur manufacturing hub, the Chennai-Bengaluru Highway and other industrial and logistics developments. The focus is likely to shift from speculative appreciation to affordable plotted developments and housing that caters to the growing industrial workforce.

Looking ahead

“Investors should hold on with their investments in the region and if possible, increase their investments,” says Rajesh Babu, managing director, Asset Advise, a consultancy firm in Chennai. His reasoning? “As for Chennai, the East cannot be developed due to the Bay of Bengal, the north is full of chemical and petrochemical industries, and the south has the atomic power station at Kalpakkam, as well as the Vedanthangal bird sanctuary. An airport cannot be promoted in these regions, and that leaves only the West. If not Parandur, the government has to identify a new place only in that region and no where else near Chennai,” says Babu.

Bengaluru has always been a city that grew by expanding outward. New technology parks, office districts and residential suburbs kept pushing their boundaries further, often faster than infrastructure could keep up. The result has been familiar to anyone who lives or works in the city – long commutes, traffic congestion and neighbourhoods where homes and workplaces remain disconnected.

But a different pattern is beginning to emerge. As Bengaluru’s technology ecosystem expands towards the Bengaluru-Chennai Industrial Corridor (BCIC), the city’s next phase of growth may be defined less by how far it stretches and more by how closely it can bring together jobs, homes and everyday life. That is an important shift because the future of urban growth is no longer about building more; it is about building smarter.

The BCIC provides the framework for this transition. Stretching across an influence area of around 560 km through Karnataka, Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh and Telangana, the corridor is designed around node-based industrial development. Instead of development happening first and infrastructure catching up later, the BCIC aims to bring industries, offices and supporting infrastructure together from the start. That approach has the potential to reshape not just economic activity, but also the way cities function.

Concentration of GCCs

The biggest driver of this change is the growing concentration of Global Capability Centres (GCCs), technology parks and industrial clusters. India’s GCC sector is entering a new phase of expansion, with office leasing expected to grow by 15%-20% over the next two years. More importantly, these are not conventional back-office operations. They represent high-value employment in engineering, research, Artificial Intelligence, finance and digital services. As these centres increasingly locate along emerging corridors rather than traditional business districts, they are gradually changing the geography of employment itself.

Bengaluru remains at the centre of this transformation. Reaffirming its position as India’s strongest commercial real estate market, the city recorded 22.1 million sq. ft of office leasing in 2025. That level of demand suggests the city’s employment engine remains robust. But the story today is not just about the volume of office space being absorbed. It is about where that demand is concentrating. Employment growth is becoming increasingly corridor-driven, supported by better connectivity, larger land parcels and the ability to create integrated business ecosystems rather than isolated office campuses.

Bengaluru’s housing market remained strong in Q1 2026, outperforming other major Indian cities. The city’s residential supply hit an all-time quarterly record of 27,000 units in the same quarter. That reflects a broader change in buyer behaviour as homebuyers are increasingly choosing locations closer to emerging employment hubs. For many professionals, especially younger working families, saving an hour of daily travel has become more valuable than living in a traditionally preferred address. Convenience, predictability and quality of life are now influencing housing decisions as much as pricing or apartment size.

Live-work-play ecosystem

This is precisely why the idea of a live-work-play ecosystem is gaining relevance. Places such as Whitefield, K.R. Puram, Sarjapur Road and Electronic City are gradually evolving beyond standalone office destinations. They are becoming mixed-use urban districts where residential communities, workplaces, retail, healthcare and recreation are expected to co-exist. Metro connectivity will certainly accelerate this transformation, but its greater contribution lies in enabling proximity. When workplaces become easier to reach, people naturally choose to live closer, reducing dependence on long daily commutes.

The same pattern can be seen in industrial growth as well. In the first quarter of 2026, industrial and warehousing leasing across Bengaluru, Chennai and Hyderabad grew by 58% compared with a year earlier. This shows that the region’s growth is not being driven by office space alone. Manufacturing, logistics and services are all expanding together, helping create stronger and more balanced economic hubs.

For developers, investors and policymakers, the lesson is becoming increasingly clear. The next opportunity does not lie in isolated office towers or speculative land parcels. It lies in creating integrated neighbourhoods where employment, housing and public infrastructure develop together. Such districts are more resilient because they support multiple economic activities while improving everyday liveability.

However, this opportunity also comes with a responsibility. Corridor-led growth cannot succeed if public transport, schools, hospitals, affordable housing and civic amenities lag behind commercial development. In the absence of thoughtful and strategic planning, the emerging corridors would simply repeat failures of the past such as infrastructure deficits that Bengaluru has spent decades trying to overcome.

Bengaluru’s expansion towards the BCIC is about more than just a new growth corridor. It is a chance to build a city where jobs, homes and infrastructure grow together. If planned well, this could help Bengaluru move beyond unchecked sprawl and create more connected, liveable neighbourhoods for the future.

Styling guide

- Layer different textures with cushions, throws and rugs to make the space feel inviting. A large rug helps visually ground the seating area, while oversized cushions encourage people to linger.
- Introduce a few sculptural accessories instead of filling every surface with décor. Leave enough room for books, drinks and everyday life because that is exactly what these spaces are meant for.
- Plants work particularly well because they soften the edges and bring freshness into the seating area. Having a bunch of fresh flowers is also a great idea.
- A coffee table stacked with books, ceramics or candles helps personalise the space without making it feel cluttered; the goal is warmth, not perfection.
- You can frame the upper perimeter of the lounge with low, built-in planters or potted architectural plants, such as ferns or structural grasses. This adds a layer of privacy for those sitting inside, without blocking any natural light.

Return of the sunken lounge

From planning and materials to styling and safety, experts explain why conversation pits are finding a place in modern homes

Rashmi Gopal Rao

Often referred to as sunken spaces that encourage people to slow down, gather and interact, conversation pits were an extremely popular design feature in the period between the 1950s and 1970s. An intimate setting mostly in the living room, these spaces are an integral part of the spatial narrative and provide the perfect architectural antidote by offering structural zoning without blocking sightlines.

By stepping down into a lounge, you get the psychological comfort of being in a separate cosy room while keeping the home's airy, open vibe. "Today's conversation pit is a contemporary reinterpretation of that philosophy. Instead of being purely nostalgic, it responds to the way modern homes function. It creates an intimate zone within larger open-plan layouts, bringing people together while offering a sense of comfort and privacy," says Natasha Kumar, co-founder and principal architect, Studio Tilt, a Goa-based architecture and interior design studio. Some design studios are also experimenting with elevated lounges that serve as conversation pits.

Pockets of calm

Conversation pits are slowly but surely becoming popular in today's homes. "It is interesting to note that in the '60s and '70s, they were a symbol of modern luxury; something you would see in homes designed for gla-

Design pointers

- The proportions of the conversation pit must relate to the room. An oversized pit can dominate the space, while a very small one loses its impact.
- The seating depth, backrest angle, step dimensions, and circulation around the pit must be ergonomically comfortable.
- Safety is key; especially in homes with young children and/or elderly family members. Aspects like gentle step proportions, adequate lighting, and clear visual edges become essential. The difference in floor level should be clearly defined, comfortably stepped, and well-lit.
- Lighting needs to be layered so that the lowered space feels warm and inviting rather than enclosed.
- Create enough flexibility so the space can be used for multiple activities. It should feel comfortable enough for everyday living, not just occasional entertaining. Invest in good upholstery, generous seat depths and durable finishes because these spaces naturally become the heart of the home.

morous parties and entertaining. Today, the intention feels very different; people are not bringing them back for nostalgia alone," says Badrinath Kaleru, director and co-founder of Studio Ardete, a design studio based in Chandigarh.

Further, open-plan homes often feel visually impressive but emotionally flat because all activities occur in a single continuous space. "Instead of making the room feel smaller, the lowered seating often gives it more character and a stronger sense of purpose," says Natasha Jain, co-founder and CEO of Natelier by Bent Chair, a luxury interior and furniture brand located in New Delhi.

Key elements

Conversations pit work best in spacious homes with generous ceiling heights, such as villas, bungalows, farmhouse residences, or apartments with large living areas. "They should never feel like a depression in the floor but rather a natural extension of the living space that encourages interaction while remaining visually connected to the rest of the home," adds Kumar.

It is key to note that a conversation pit should be integrated into the architectural planning from the beginning because it affects floor levels, circulation and structural planning. "The proportions need to feel comfortable with easy access, good sightlines and enough circulation around the seating. Ceiling height is equally important because the lowered floor changes how the volume of the room is experienced. Natural light also plays a big role, as these spaces should feel inviting rather than enclosed," says Prerna Kaleru, director and co-founder, Studio Ardete.

According to Jain, the biggest consideration is circulation. "People should be able to move around the pit naturally without it becoming an obstacle. The proportions also have to feel generous enough that nobody feels boxed in. I always recommend integrating the seating into the architecture rather than treating it as loose furniture," she adds. The design must allow the surrounding volume of the home to breathe. "Sightlines should remain entirely transparent, ensuring that someone sitting in the lounge maintains an immediate, effortless connection with the rest of the house and the unfolding landscape outside," says Seema Pandey, co-founder of Studio Arquite, a multidisciplinary Noida-based design practice.

The success of a conversation pit thus lies in balancing architecture with comfort. "The seating should encourage interaction, allowing everyone to face one another naturally. Upholstery should prioritise comfort without compromising on elegance, as these spaces are meant for longer conversations," says Ruchi Gehani, principal designer of Azure Interiors, a Raipur-based interior design.

Materiality today is honest and earthy. "Rather than high-pile shag carpets, we utilise locally sourced natural stones like yellow tandur or polished micro-concrete underfoot. This is complemented by breathable lime-wash finishes on the walls and natural bamboo or rattan screens that soften acoustics while letting the space breathe," says Kapil Razdan, co-founder, Studio Arquite.

Lighting is becoming increasingly layered rather than decorative. Concealed LED lighting, recessed step lights, wall washers, pendant lamps, and dimmable fixtures are being used together to create a warm, inviting atmosphere that changes seamlessly from daytime 'family use' to evening 'entertainment'.

We take a look at three uniquely designed conversation pits.

The Bengaluru-based freelance writer is passionate about all things design, travel, food, art and culture.

A Slice of Ubud | Studio Tilt, Goa

Positioned in the living area, overlooking the pool and seamlessly connected to the indoor and outdoor spaces, this conversation pit acts as the primary gathering space for family and guests while maintaining visual connectivity with the dining, kitchen and the outdoors.

"The palette is warm and understated, with earthy neutrals complemented by natural timber, locally sourced stone, lime-textured walls and soft linen upholstery. Lighting is layered to create different moods throughout the day. Natural daylight floods the space during the morning, while soft lighting from lamps, pendant fixtures and the pool creates a warm and intimate atmosphere in the evenings," adds Kumar. The most distinctive aspect of the space is how it creates intimacy without isolation. The lowered floor level subtly defines the seating area without interrupting the openness of the home. It is further anchored by an indoor tree, adding a biophilic touch to the space. The seamless relationship between the conversation pit and the pool further strengthens the experience, allowing the indoors and outdoors to feel like one continuous living environment.

Is it for you?

- The cost of designing, constructing and styling a conversation pit is ₹1.5 lakh upwards. This depends on various factors such as the size, kind of materials used, etc., and includes costs for excavation, masonry, furniture, furnishings, lighting, etc.
- Perfect for large homes which are at least over 2,000 sq. ft. Further the living space needs to feature an open-concept layout and the home needs to have generous ceiling heights.
- Some disadvantages of conversation pits include limited layout flexibility, increased cost of renovation in case of removing one, safety hazards including risk of tripping, injury, etc., especially when you have children and the elderly at home.
- Avoid over-styling the space; it needs to be elegant, understated and clutter-free.

Avinash Singla Residence | Studio Ardete, Chandigarh

This living space reflects Studio Ardete's belief that architecture should shape experiences through levels, light and carefully composed volumes rather than excessive ornamentation. Instead of treating the room as a single plane, the design introduces a uniquely designed raised lounge that subtly separates functions while maintaining visual continuity.

"Warm timber flooring and oak wall panelling balance the cool blue backdrop, while soft grey upholstery adds depth without competing for attention. Crisp white walls and ceilings allow the materials to breathe, creating a calm setting punctuated by playful accents through sculptural furniture and colourful art objects," adds Badrinath. What makes this space particularly distinctive is its treatment of levels. "Rather than relying on partitions, the raised platform transforms the living area into a destination within the home. The sculptural staircase, integrated storage and seamless transition between spaces demonstrate how architecture can create hierarchy, encourage interaction and make even an open-plan layout feel intimate and engaging," adds Prerna.

Villa Selene | Studio Arquite, Goa

This sprawling 10,000 sq. ft holiday home is an ode to tropical living and features courtyards, pavilions and sit-outs, all of which seamlessly bring the outdoors in. The villa features multiple conversation pits, including one in the living room, the courtyard area and even an outdoor pit adjacent to the pool.

"We prioritised a deeply sincere dialogue between clean, minimal forms and tactile, grounded materiality," Razdan says.

The zones feature a natural palette of warm lime wash on the walls, local yellow tandur stone and kadappa underfoot to provide organic cooling. The colour palette stays muted with earthy shades of brown, green and monochrome dominating the space. "Plenty of greenery and natural materials like reclaimed wood and bamboo lend a timeless yet grounded aesthetic," says Razdan.
