Building for everyone

Ahead of World Architecture Day, architects and industry professionals look at what adequate housing could mean for India's growing cities

Anisha Menezes

There is much more to turning a house into a home than simply having a roof over one's head. Ahead of the World Architecture Day, established by the International Union of Architects (UIA) in 1985, and observed annually on the first Monday of October, it augurs well to rethink how adequate, safe and sound is our housing.

The architecture day runs in parallel with the UN's World Habitat Day, whose theme for 2026 is 'Adequate Housing for All'. The UIA Council has chosen 'Housing is a Human Right. Build It' as the theme for this year's World Architecture Day, to be marked on October 5. Both themes align well with global efforts for sustainable development and adequate housing for all.

Architects, interior stylists and real estate industry professionals translate these goals in the context of India's burgeoning towns and cities.

With inputs from K.S. Swati

Building material

Affordability in housing is usually discussed in terms of how cheaply a building can be put up. We need to look at the question differently. For housing projects, particularly those serving lower-income communities, we could build regional material libraries, establish clearer specifications for locally produced stone and create dependable links between designers, processors and suppliers. Instead of looking only at the cheapest option on day one, we could also ask what a material is likely to cost over the years. If a material can last longer, require less maintenance and support businesses closer to where a building is being constructed, those factors should have a place in the affordability conversation, too.

Rishabh Jain, director, international business, Petros Stone, Pune

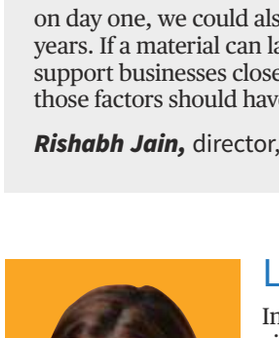

Luxury design

In contrast to densely packed tier-I metros, tier-II cities offer significantly more space, prompting a noticeable shift of people moving there as companies expand beyond major hubs. Today, home buyers are prioritising overall quality of life over the fast-paced hustle of traditional city living.

Redefining luxury housing starts with dismantling the notion that luxury must be price prohibitive. An affordable home can undeniably be luxurious. In my opinion, luxury stems from everyday details – thoughtfully chosen lighting, tactile bedding, and quality materials. Even compact spaces on modest budgets can evoke a sense of opulence. True modern luxury isn't about emulating someone else's aesthetic, but about infusing authentic personality into a space while leaning into local materials and thoughtful design.

Sarah Sham, principal designer, Essajees Atelier, Mumbai

Hospitality

There's a shift in hospitality design from an aesthetics-first approach to one that incorporates more thought into the function and the climate and how a space is experienced by people. For design, not all great design means more design. Hospitality design has to synthesise the function, purpose, context, climate, and the site in a beautiful and sensitive way. This is even more critical in design for hospitality since the purpose of a building is to take guests to a destination and this is further amplified for eco-lodges that aim to take guests to wild and remote destinations. The future of great hospitality design is in incorporating the climate and people of a location in a sustainable way and interpreting it all in a beautiful and thoughtful way with design elements in a built structure. It's about making thoughtful, climate-conscious choices that take into account of the location, the climate and the culture.

Manav Khanduja, director of Pugdundee Safaris, Bhopal

Heritage and climate responsive

Every project has the potential to discover its own solution. It should emerge from the particular combination of place, people, climate, resources, technology, culture and aspirations that make that project unique. Traditional or vernacular buildings are a great source of inspiration, they provided successful solutions at a different time, with different materials, technology and lifestyles. The way we interact with our spaces today has changed, so a mindless imitation is also not the answer.

Perhaps, this is the real journey of architecture: not to impose a predetermined answer, but to discover the answer that is already latent within the problem.

Dhruv Futnani, architect and green building consultant at Green by Dhruv Futnani, Chennai

Residential

Housing is not only the habitat of individuals but also the environment within which family members or society co-exist in general. Thus, if adequate housing is not provided, then there arises a social housing problem, a family problem, and a problem for the future generations of society. In this regard, all agencies involved in the housing development process should, on this World Architecture Day, look at housing provision from the other side of the design and construction plan. The residential sector appeals to all stakeholders to consider building houses that are safe, stable, and secure structures with good architecture and design to meet the needs of their people. Housing is a human right, and we will build it because it is our pleasure.

Keshav Mangla, general manager, business development, Forteasia Realty, Delhi

Interior design

For me, 'Housing for All' cannot stop at four walls and a roof. It should also mean the right to live well within those walls. In India, that makes interior design less about decoration and more about intelligent, empathetic problem-solving. Our homes have to respond to compact footprints, multigenerational families, varied budgets and spaces that often need to perform several roles throughout the day.

Good design, therefore, is about doing more with less, without making it feel like less. Flexible furniture, thoughtful storage, local materials, repurposing what already exists and planning spaces around real routines can make a home both accessible and deeply personal.

Anubha Aneja, interior stylist and founder, HōmAnAn, Delhi

Adaptive reuse

It's our responsibility to look at the current building stock as something with huge potential instead of razing buildings to the ground. What one needs to realise is a building that has already been built has a carbon footprint assigned to it, and extending the life of that building would create a positive impact. It just takes a bit of creativity and thinking out of the box to see how existing building stock can be tweaked and upgraded to meet the current and future needs.

New meaning of proximity

With employment hubs spreading across cities, housing is increasingly being planned around connectivity, convenience and everyday needs

GETTY IMAGES/ISTOCKPHOTO

Shivam Agarwal

A weekday morning in any of India's major cities has its own rhythm. School drop-offs are planned around traffic, office departures around peak hours, and social plans are often shaped by the time it takes to move across the city. Over time, these everyday considerations have begun to influence where people choose to live and what they increasingly expect from a good location.

Metro networks are also expanding rapidly, improving mobility and opening new corridors for development.

At the same time, the geography of work is becoming more distributed. Bengaluru now has major employment centres across Whitefield, the Outer Ring Road, Electronic City and North Bengaluru. Hyderabad has expanded towards the Financial District and newer western corridors. Delhi NCR spans multiple business centres across Delhi, Gurugram and Noida, while Mumbai continues to grow across BKC, the western suburbs, Thane and Navi Mumbai.

As employment spreads across new urban nodes, housing naturally follows. The larger opportunity is to ensure that schools, healthcare, retail, recreation and public spaces grow alongside it, rather than catching up to it years later.

A simple concept

The 15-minute city offers a useful way to think about this. The idea is simple. The places people use most frequently should be within convenient reach of home, while strong transport networks connect neighbourhoods to the larger city.

For India, the principle matters more than the literal 15 minutes. Our cities are large, dense and constantly evolving. People will continue to travel for work, education and leisure, but a greater share of everyday needs can be brought closer to home.

Getting there requires as much disciplined planning and sequencing as it does good design. It starts with assembling land at a scale that allows a community to evolve as a complete ecosystem, with schools, healthcare, retail and workplaces planned from the outset.

The same thinking applies to connectivity. A metro line or highway interchange can transform a micro market, yet its full value is realised only when the last mile works seamlessly. Feeder services, cycling infrastructure and continuous pedestrian pathways need to connect transport networks to homes, workplaces and everyday destinations. This calls for municipal bodies, transport authorities and developers to work to a shared timeline, aligning roads, utilities and feeder networks with the pace of development.

Connectivity is key

Indian real estate has always understood the value of connectivity. Highways, airports, Metro corridors and employment hubs have transformed micro markets and created strong residential demand. As cities mature, proximity is becoming equally important, and it is built the same way connectivity was: deliberately, ahead of demand, rather than in response to it. The quality of a location is increasingly shaped by access to schools, hospitals, retail, green spaces, recreation and community infrastructure.

This also creates an opportunity for integrated, multi-generational campuses. Indian families often span generations, each with different needs. Children need education and safe spaces to play, working professionals value access to employment and mobility, families seek convenience and recreation, while older residents benefit from healthcare, wellness, green spaces and opportunities for social interaction. In practice, this means a single master plan that brings schools, clinics, retail, workspaces and parks onto one campus, with construction phased so these amenities are ready alongside the homes around them, not years after.

India's next housing boom will create new skylines and urban centres. Its lasting value will come from how well these places support everyday life, and that depends on decisions made early: how land is assembled, how amenities are sequenced against construction, and how closely developers, municipal bodies and transport authorities plan together. The real opportunity is to create neighbourhoods where people can live, work, learn and grow across generations, with more of what matters within easy reach.

The writer is vice-president, strategy of Sattva Group.

Glimpses of the hill house in Yercaud, Tamil Nadu; (below) Malli Saravanan.
(SYAM SREESYLAM)

Rashmi Gopal Rao

A house above the hills

Raised on stilts, this Yercaud home preserves the contours, vegetation and water flow of its site

There are some projects that are totally dictated by nature; homes where the surrounding landscape acts as a structural blueprint. Whispers of the Wild, located within an eco-sensitive residential community in Yercaud in Tamil Nadu and designed by Chennai-based MAWI Design, falls under this category.

"The design began with an understanding of what was already present on the site: a sloping terrain, dense vegetation, an existing mature tree and uninterrupted views of the valley. These conditions became the basis for organising the house, with the mature tree becoming a focal point for the plan. An L-shaped communal deck was organised around it, with the more private spaces placed at the two ends of the L and the living, dining and kitchen positioned between them," says Malli Saravanan, founding partner of MAWI Design. The 2,400 sq.ft house is organised across two levels and is home to a Salem-based family of six on a 10,000 sq.ft plot.

Minimal intervention

It is interesting to note that the sloping terrain prompted the architects to elevate the house on stilts. This allowed the building to sit above the existing ground levels, limiting intervention to the site and allowing the existing vegetation, natural contours and movement of water to continue beneath the structure. "We also constructed a man-made stream which was introduced as part of the landscape design in response to the small streams that once ran through the site. Though these had diminished and their paths changed over time, their presence were etched in the site's hydrological memory," adds Saravanan.

Placed beneath the elevated house, the stream directly runs below the foyer which thoughtfully has a glass floor. It is feature that is intrinsic to the relationship between the building, the terrain and the landscape below. "It allows water to remain perceptible as part of the landscape while bringing in sensory elements into the everyday experience of the house and this includes its gurgling sound, meandering movements and reflection from the glass floor. During monsoons and heavy rainfall, runoff from the slopes is diverted along a separate path, keeping it away from the constructed stream and the building terrain," mentions Saravanan.

Central deck

The ground floor of the house comprises the car park, housekeeping quarters and a guest bedroom with an extended deck. The first floor comprises the entrance foyer, living, dining and kitchen, along with the master bedroom and a second guest bedroom. The first-floor spaces have been organised around an L-shaped communal deck that wraps around an existing mature tree, making the deck a central element in the organisation of the house. The living, dining, and kitchen flow effortlessly into one another in an open-plan layout.

Natural light pours in through this opening, shifting throughout the day. The cast, fleeting shadows heighten the sense of a dynamic connection to the natural world. "This experience is extended further into a deep bay window in the dining room. The bedrooms are positioned along the quieter edges of the plan, oriented towards the valley and the morning light. The master bedroom extends outward as a cantilevered glass volume, offering a 180-degree view of the valley. The structure was planned to avoid columns, which would interrupt the view," says Saravanan.

The project hence used random rubble for the walls which was abundantly available in the region and effortlessly served to bring the outdoors in. Leathered Kota stone has been used for the flooring. The leathered finish of the Kota has a tactile quality that replicates the sensation of walking on natural elements. Oxide finishes add texture and introduce a muted, earthy palette which add warmth to the ambience.

Key challenge

According to Saravanan, the key challenge while executing the project was working within the limits of an eco-sensitive, forested site with a sloping terrain while preserving all the qualities that made the site desirable in the first place. Flattening the land was not an option and establishing the house around the mature tree entailed considerable planning. A lesson in architecture being in harmony with nature, Whispers of the Wild is a project where the landscape was not treated as an external aspect but as an element integral to the way the family experienced and used the space.
