A power start to the day

As an extension of its free noon meal scheme, Ramakrishna Mission Vivekananda College will start serving breakfast for students from economically poor backgrounds from October 5 onwards

LIFFY THOMAS

There is now a lip-smacking incentive for students of Ramakrishna Mission Vivekananda College in Mylapore to be on the campus before 8.30 a.m. The college is starting a free breakfast scheme for students, which will be inaugurated on October 5 by Swami Satyajnanananda, president of Sri Ramakrishna Math.

From mint coriander idly with mixed dhal sambar, veg rava khichdi with peanut chutney, wheat vermicelli veg upma with green moong dal gravy, the menu curated by NGO Akshaya Patra Foundation promises to be both interesting and wholesome. It will be brought from the Foundation's kitchen on Greams Road in Thousand Lights every working day to feed approximately 600 students.

For this autonomous institution, this is a extension of its free noon meal programme that it has been offering since 2004 to students from less privileged backgrounds enrolled with the college.

Approximately 600 students are currently registered as beneficiaries under this 'no cost noon meal scheme'. Each beneficiary is issued an identity card to avail of this facility, and an average of 450 students benefit from the scheme every working day, says a note shared by the college management.

Students enrolled for the noon meal scheme will be added to the breakfast scheme, and this is entirely supported by Akshaya Patra.

The college management feels the breakfast scheme would help address the decline in admissions to undergraduate programmes by providing additional welfare support to economically disadvantaged students, improve attendance and promise a healthy start to the day.

A spokesperson from Akshaya Patra Foundation said that this would be the first college in Tamil Nadu where it will be initiating such a programme. In Chennai, they currently serve breakfast to 55 government-aided schools.

"The breakfast menu in college would be slightly different from what we serve children at schools. It is a pilot programme and the menu is based on regional preferences, ensuring it is both wholesome and nutritious," says the spokesperson.

Roadside parking chokes traffic near Gopalapuram ground

SEENA DIVAKARAN

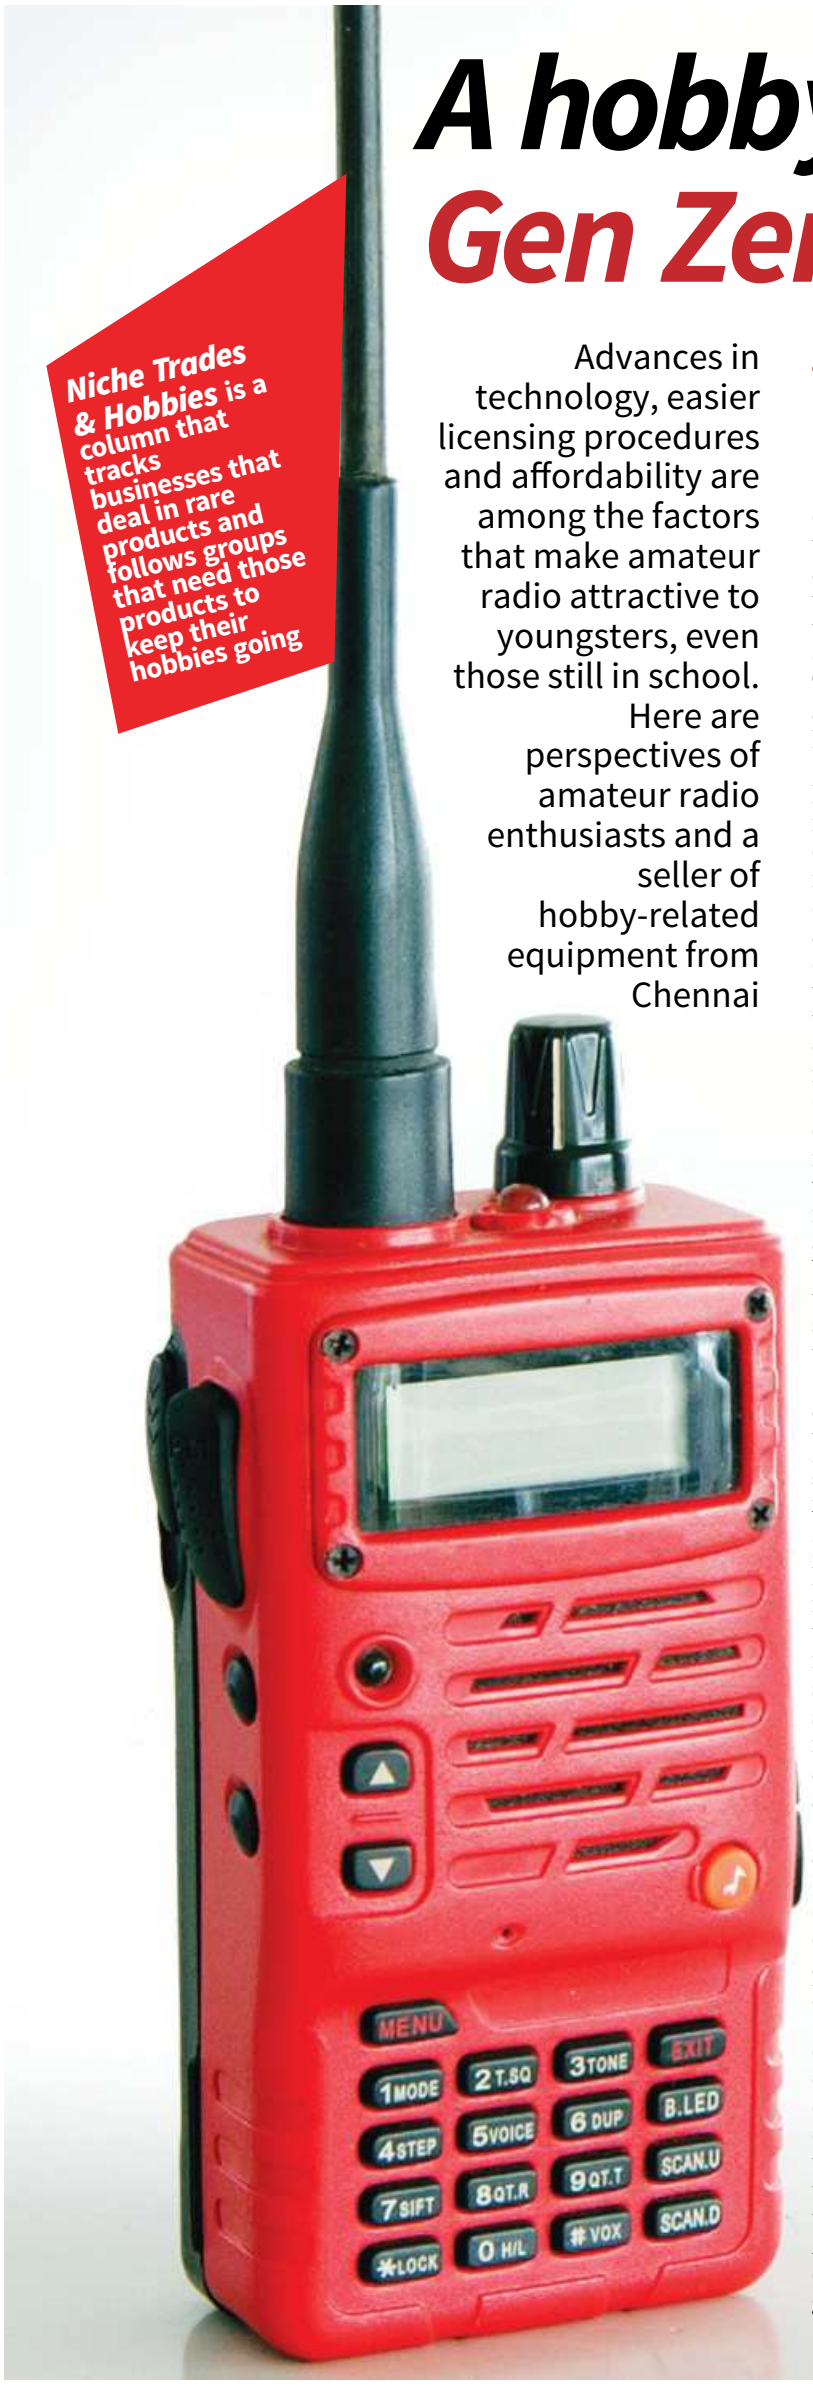

Roadside parking near the Gopalapuram ground on weekends has become a major cause of traffic congestion in the area. Two-wheelers parked on both sides of the road by people visiting the ground considerably reduce the available carriageway, making it difficult for motorists travelling in opposite directions to pass, particularly during peak hours. The resulting bottlenecks cause considerable inconvenience to residents and other road users. GCC and the Traffic Police may look into the issue and regulate parking along this stretch. Designated parking areas, appropriate No Parking restrictions and regular enforcement could help restore smooth traffic flow and improve safety for motorists and pedestrians.

Niche Trades & Hobbies is a column that tracks businesses that deal in rare products and follows groups that need those products to keep their hobbies going

A hobby evolves to meet Gen Zers on their terms

Advances in technology, easier licensing procedures and affordability are among the factors that make amateur radio attractive to youngsters, even those still in school. Here are perspectives of amateur radio enthusiasts and a seller of hobby-related equipment from Chennai

LAKSHMY HARIKRISHNAN

There is usually an apocalyptic air to how Ham radio is perceived. The Ham radio enthusiast is readily visualised as trudging into a land overtaken by a massive disaster and where all technology-based communication lines outside the amateur-radio sphere have broken down. The enthusiast has morphed into a saviour, connecting with a fellow hobbyist elsewhere in the "universe" and communicating a local situation, dire and distressing, amidst the static and crackle of radio communication, to reach help to the suffering. This description is indeed fact-aligned. Ham radio enthusiasts do take centre stage during disasters. One witnessed that during the Kerala floods of 2018 and closer home, in the harrowing first week of December 2015 in Chennai. But distress communication is only one of the things riding on amateur radio air waves. Net sessions (as on-air meetups of Ham radio hobbyists are known) are also defined by banter, in fact, more by small talk than SOS calls. And do not be surprised if the banter is punctuated with Gen Z lingo.

N. Deepan (call sign VU2DPN), a key member of Madras Amatuer Radio Society (MARS), points out that the Ham radio hobby has never been as accessible to youngsters as it is now. From licensing to practising the hobby, the procedures of initiation and the operation of the equipment have become ridiculously simple. Having seen 63 summers and getting started on the hobby around four decades ago, Deepan is at a vantage point to talk about the hobby's evolution.

The Wireless Planning and Coordination wing (WPC) is responsible for conducting Amateur Station Operator's Certificate (ASOC) examination and issuing the license.

Deepan underlines the examinations have become simpler as technology has organically taken certain "subjects" off the table. And the removal of this barrier encourages the entry of youngsters. Anyone aged 12 and above can appear for the exam and get the license. "Where it took one or two years to get a license, it takes approximately one month," observes Deepan, noting that objective questions have replaced the earlier pattern of examination.

And the new license holder can hit the ground running, the process of getting started on the hobby also having become facile. EchoLink, Z3 DMR, and Droidstar allow licensed operators to communicate using just a phone with other amateur radio enthusiasts. Once the license is validated, usually within 24 hours, the software can be used. And that obviates the need to invest in ham radio equipment; that can wait. Deepan has seen the ham radio equipment move from valves to transistors, ICs and now Software Defined Radio (SDR). With advancing technology, the equipment has shrunk, and so has their prices. Deepan attributes the fall in prices to the shift from imported equipment to local dealerships (to sell ham radio equipment, a dealer's license is required).

That brings us to someone like Gaurav Srivatsava and his wife Shivangi Gaurav, both ham radio license holders and diehard enthusiasts, and beyond that, owners of Radio Brewery in Iyyapanthangal (radiobrewery.com), which sells amatuer radio equipment. Shivangi largely manages the business while Gaurav continues to work in the IT sector. Their own personal struggles in finding reliable and cost-effective equipment locally had crystallised into this business venture in 2018. Gaurav recalls that besides importing, Ham radio enthusiasts in Chennai were dependent on a couple of dealers in Delhi. The hobbyists would together buy in bulk to keep prices within their comfort range. Among those who encouraged them to start this business was Deepan, one of Gaurav's mentors and supporters.

Malini D

Among factors that augur well for the hobby, Gaurav says, is the portability of the ham radio gear. He recalls the time when valve radios, measuring six by six feet, "appropriated" a room in exchange for the joy of communicating on amateur radio air waves. Fast forward to now, a low-powered ham radio equipment can "fit into a small bread box". Deepan notes that even if one were to route their ham radio communication through an amateur radio satellite, the allied equipment, which includes SDR dongle, dish antenna and up converter or transverter, is easy on the back, being eminently portable. Both Deepan and Gaurav have noticed youngsters taking to the hobby. Gaurav points out his daughter Pari Gaurav (VI2JXB/ KN6GRI, US amateur radio identifier ID), 19 years old now, cleared the WPC examination at age 12. Deepan's daughter, Malini D. (VU3JJT) is also an avid ham radio enthusiast. Even youngsters without any precedent of ham radio engagement in their families are gravitating towards the hobby for the doors of communication it opens in various parts of the world. Deepan notes, "On the Net, all radio ham hobbyists connect and converse as equals."

To sum up, this hobby seems to have been made for Gen Zers (and the ones following them too) for two reasons. It is a generation that derives its strength and purpose from communication, even with those they will never meet in real life, and this hobby is geared to that. And two, this generation thrives on volunteering, and this hobby can provide opportunities for that during extremely harrowing times.

How accessible is your community?

A scene from Block A For Accessibility

LIFFY THOMAS

How accessible is your apartment community? That's the central idea of this short film Block A For Accessibility, released with a private screening at PVR Satyam Cinemas on September 25. The 20-minute CBFC-certified film by YWTC (Yes, We Too Can!!!) Charitable Trust, in collaboration with Fiserv and United Way Mumbai as the CSR partner, is a story of care, community, and design.

The film revolves around Natarajan, an ageing father, who after starting to use a wheelchair keeps himself isolated from the vibrant life of his apartment complex because he does not want to trouble his son.

A sudden accident at the building's stairs becomes a turning point for the entire community.

The film follows the internal realisation of the association secretary and the decisive action of the builder.

Natarajan's character is played by a deaf person, Ravi Kumar. Voice was given by Umapathy, a wheelchair user. Most of the cast and crew are persons with disabilities, including the director. The film has sign language interpretations along with subtitles.

The film addresses a universal civic necessity: accessible housing that accommodates an ageing population and ensures people of all abilities live with independence and dignity.

Handrails: a silver jubilee gift

Not many residents at Raheja Regency, a 25-year-old apartment community in MRC Nagar, likely know the two people who were instrumental in getting handrails installed at strategic points in the society recently. Nonagenarian Arjun Krishna and septuagenarian Vasantha Arjun were too modest to talk about this accessibility feature and agreed to give their names after much prodding by this journalist.

One of the earliest residents of this gated community, when the couple were part of the resident association, they got handrails fixed at most of the blocks some 20 years ago. These have been patronised by all, especially the senior citizens. But the community could do with some more, and the couple themselves have experienced the practical difficulty in not having them.

"One of the ladies has even fallen not having a railing to hold on to it," says Vasantha. The couple sponsored the entire cost of installing the handrailings at some new locations as a gift to the community that has been their home for the last 25 years (the couple marked 25 years of staying in the community this June).

Pool lift: for easy swimming

Madhavi Latha Prathigudupu's day is not complete without accessing the swimming pool at her gated community in Arumbakkam. Since 2022, what makes this common amenity accessible for this para-athlete is the pool lift that was incorporated.

The swimming champion cannot do without being in the pool and her late father had to help her get into the waters. She convinced Triumph Apartments, a community with 108 flats where she owns one, to make the pool accessible. "Before installing the pool lift, we had a demonstration done by the manufacturer with the committee members to get their approval," says Madhavi, president of YWTC Charitable Trust.

Today, she goes independently into the pool (she controls the lift pool through a remote) and most importantly has raised the importance of having inclusive amenities at gated communities not just for those with disabilities but even for use by the elderly. There was no ramp when she moved in to the community; the association did not just construct one for access to her block but made the improvisation at other towers as well.

Accessibility standards of the National Building Code insist on a barrier-free built environment and all common facilities accessible to all people. "It's your right, so ask the builder for such accessible features before investing in a flat," she adds.

Sensory park: designed by special parents

In August, the Community Living Association for Parents of Special Citizens (CLAPS) celebrated four years of moving into an inclusively designed campus at Tiruvallur, near Poondi reservoir.

A group of 50 parents of young adults with special needs got together to conceptualise such a model in a 8.5 acre residential campus that comes with a host of universally designed and accessible amenities.

Latha Krishnan and Vaijayanthi Srinivasan, both special parents, say the activity centre, swimming pool, and sensory park are the most popular among the young adults aged 20 and above.

Unlike the apartment communities where they faced many challenges, here everything is customised in keeping with the different needs of the children, a majority are on the spectrum, some with Down's Syndrome and intellectually disability.

The sensory park, for instance, is a hit for those with autism and has equipment with different textures. The activity centre allows them choose programmes as per one's moods and likes. To oversee the children, there are many external professionals, including the warden, supervisor and activity head.

Never too late to start afresh

R. RAGU

In cricket, one regularly comes across teams that shift to a whole new lane in the second innings, with surprising progress, eclipsing their first-innings performance. And in that process, they bring immense joy and wonder to spectators.

Seshadri Sukumar has pulled off something similar to that.

Here are the details of 71-year-old Seshadri's second innings: a Press Information Bureau-accredited international sports photographer from Chennai and a Canon EOS Ambassador. He now has a reputation for "checking into" major international sporting events. As this article is being written, he is shooting images of sporting excellence at the 20th Asian Games, unfolding at Aichi Prefecture and Nagaya in Japan.

Before zooming in on what he is doing now, a quick run of his first innings: Sukumar had been working in the banking sector, being an official photographer with Indian Overseas Bank (IOB). He always had an intense desire to be a sports photographer, but that remained a desire for a drearily long time.

When retirement from corporate career was looming large, Sukumar took the plunge and started pursuing sports photography full steam ahead.

After Sukumar has been years into sports photography, in 2021, Sukumar's nephew shared a story about his uncle's passion for sports photography, online. Sukumar was 66 years old then and covering the Tokyo Olympic Games. And the story of how someone is flourishing in a career kickstarted mid-life caught the world's imagination.

Sukuamar's portfolio includes multiple Olympic Games, FIFA World Cups (including the most recent edition), ICC World Cups, Grand Slam tournaments, Asian Games, Commonwealth Games, NBA events, FINA World Championships, FIDE World Cups and MotoGP, among several other major sporting events.

Among his iconic photographs is one the Rio Olympics, one that captured the contrasting emotions of the winner and the loser; the photograph won his a gold medal from the Photographic Society of America (PSA).

Sukumar's professional photographs have been distributed through international wire services and stock photography libraries, including Alamy, Zuma Press, IMAGO Images, SOPA Images and Reuters Connect.

Sukumar's life and career are a reminder that it is never too late to start afresh.

Chennai resident Seshadri Sukumar kickstarted a career in sports photography, mid-life, turning his back on the familiar and the comfortable and that has made all the difference. Aged 71, he is right now covering the 20th Asian Games in Japan

Three-year-old undergoes liver transplant

Rainbow Children's Hospital performed a liver transplant on a three-year-old patient diagnosed with the rare systemic disorder called Langerhans Cell Histiocytosis (LCH). According to a press release, the procedure was successful and it was considered a complicated case due to an underlying congenital abnormality of kidneys causing recurrent urinary tract infections.

The child underwent a living donor liver transplant, receiving a portion of his father's liver. The transplant was performed by Dr. Mettu Srinivas Reddy, Group Director - Department of Liver Transplantation & HPB Surgery; along with Dr. Somashekara H R, Senior Consultant - Paediatric Hepatology & Liver Transplantation. A team of multidisciplinary doctors were also part of the procedure.

The is yet another case highlighting the importance of a multidisciplinary approach in managing complex paediatric conditions, adds the release.

On the occasion, Dr. Somashekara said, "This was an exceptionally complex case because we were not dealing with a single problem. We had to manage a rare systemic disease with severe liver involvement, while also dealing with the limitations that the liver dysfunction placed on chemotherapy. When recurrent infections emerged, we had to identify and correct the underlying urinary abnormality before the child could proceed to transplant. Each decision had to be carefully coordinated with the next. The involvement of our hemato - oncology, hepatology and liver transplant, nephrology and urology teams allowed us to address these challenges together and take the child through treatment in a planned and coordinated manner."

Adding on to this case, Dr. Mettu Srinivas Reddy said, "Performing a liver transplant in a 3.5-year-old child with significant liver involvement and multiple associated medical complications requires meticulous planning at every stage. Before transplantation, the child had to be stabilised and the recurrent infections and congenital urinary abnormality had to be appropriately addressed.

Attack on MTC conductor: preventive measures needed

B. ANNAPOORANI

Recently, I came across a newspaper article about a group of students assaulting a conductor of a Metropolitan Transport Corporation (MTC) bus plying from Iyyappathangal to Royapuram.

The students were travelling on the footboard. The conductor requested them to come inside to close the doors. They refused to come in and continued to travel on the footboard.

The students subsequently argued with the conductor and attacked him. This incident is highly condemnable. In addition, MTC should take a lesson from this. The MTC should take serious note of this incident, increase the frequency of bus services during rush hour, especially the students' special buses, and deploy police personnel to protect its crew members and the public.
