Museum as meditative escape

At the award-winning Aatma Manthan Museum, one material and one palette work towards creating a spiritual and sensorial sanctuary

Anisha Menezes

What must a meditative room provide? Silence, an absence of sensorial overload, a focus on nature or maybe a guiding voice? What if an entire museum could use its spatial plan, surfaces, and immersive experience to drive inward reflection? The Aatma Manthan Museum, located in Nathdwara, Rajasthan, has been envisioned as a material meditation on form where the space is the muse, and the method of arriving at stillness is movement across its zones. Winning the prestigious BLT Built Design Awards - Interior Design of the Year last December, the project was recognised for its imaginative design of a meditative museum. The museum offers a technology-assisted meditative experience, without guidance or intentional direction by a voice. The moniker of the museum is derived from a combination of aatma (soul), mana (mind), and tan (body) to evoke a meditative state. Spread out over a sprawling 18,000 sq. ft. and built on a budget of ₹9 crore, the project was designed by the Mumbai-based firm Sanjay Puri Architects. Its principal architect, Sanjay Puri, says the shape of the plot presented both an opportunity and an obstacle in creating a sequential, immersive space. Located at the base of the State of Belief, the space is not a regular geometrical one; it is an undulating, irregular expanse that requires a reimagining of the traditional meditative room. CONTINUED ON

Until a few years ago, office spaces were synonymous with cubicles, work desks and closed meeting rooms, all put together in a structured layout. Since then, things have come a long way with an increased focus on sustainability, biophilic design, flexibility, ergonomics, multipurpose spaces and wellness areas. With an intrinsic relationship between structure, materiality, and the senses, many offices today exude vibes that blur the boundaries between the workplace and home. Case in point is Sanofi's Hyderabad office, aptly called 'House of Dreams', which is spread across a massive 2,50,000 square feet over six floors.

The space is thoughtfully organised into three key areas: the arrival experience, workspace floors, and hospitality experience. "The arrival experience features the main entry, town hall, and interview centre, while the work floors accommodate more than 2,000 employees in dynamic, collaborative environments. The hospitality experience is a full-service cafeteria offering fresh, wholesome meals to employees throughout the day," says Mrinal Duggal, head of Sanofi.

No logo or waiting area

The arrival experience is akin to entering a home rather than a traditional office. It is surrounded by gardens, art, and rustic materials that create an immediate sense of approachability. "Warm textures, handmade ceramic tiles, and furniture sourced from local vendors were intentional design decisions," says Jaime Daza, design director at Gensler, an interior designer firm based in Bengaluru. "Natural fabrics, rattan, Indian-inspired textures and colours are some of the elements that have been consistently used across the floors. Some other design interventions include minimising the use of glass, metallic finishes, and a detailed approach to the use of wallpaper and multiple tones of wood."

The arrival experience is stripped of all details that one would expect from an office reception – there is no logo, reception counter, or waiting area. "Every meeting room was carefully prepared as a unique home-scale space, comfy with different colours and materials typically used in residential projects, and decorated like a studio room. Soft lighting and handmade furniture complete the sets for every meeting room," adds Daza.

Different areas of Sanofi's new office in Hyderabad.
SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT

The entire office has been designed with the purpose of making it feel like home. "At every step, the decision-making process we followed was inspired by the way we do things at home – arriving, resting, enjoying, dining, working, and more," explains Daza.

At the working level, the space includes specific considerations to guarantee successful sessions in multiple formats: active, passive, group, and focused. This provides options for every kind of individual and every working style.

Positive vibes

The design has resonated well with Sanofi's employees. "Most of them describe it as a welcoming space, ingrained in Indian culture," says Duggal. "The design has also helped foster creativity and a culture of collaboration as they have the freedom to choose between quiet, reflective areas and vibrant communal zones, which allows people to work in ways that feels most instinctive to them." Employees have experienced a remarkable difference in how they spend their days, she adds, due to "this balance between energy and ease, and it has inspired them to bring their most true selves to work every day".

The cost of delay

How construction slowdown erodes value and pushes real estate towards predictability

Abhijith R. Priyan

India's real estate sector is evolving rapidly, yet one persistent issue continues to undermine its long-term value: construction delays. Beyond missed handover dates, delays create a ripple effect of uncertainty that erodes financial value, weakens buyer confidence, and increases systemic risk across the ecosystem. In an industry where timelines directly influence trust, capital efficiency, and asset pricing, uncertainty has emerged as one of the most expensive hidden costs.

Construction delays in India are rarely caused by a single factor. Instead, they stem from a combination of fragmented planning, manual execution, and limited real-time visibility into project progress. Traditional construction models rely heavily on informal labour structures and reactive decision-making. This leaves little room for predictability.

Regulatory approvals and compliance processes further complicate timelines, while fluctuating material costs and financing pressures amplify execution risk. Without integrated planning and transparent monitoring, even minor disruptions can cascade into months of delay.

Financial cost

Delays directly inflate project costs. Interest during construction continues to accrue, while input costs rise due to inflation and supply volatility. These pressures either compress developer margins or increase end prices, affecting affordability and demand.

Equally significant is capital lock-in. When projects overrun timelines, capital remains tied up longer than planned, limiting reinvestment into new developments. For institutional investors and lenders, unpredictable execution translates into higher risk premiums, reduced exposure, or tighter funding terms – ultimately slowing sectoral growth.

Extended construction timelines force buyers to juggle EMIs and rent simultaneously, triggering frustration and legal disputes. Over time, repeated delays across the sector have reshaped buyer behaviour, with increased preference for transparent, milestone-driven delivery models.

Regulatory frameworks such as RERA have improved accountability, but compliance alone cannot fix execution inefficiencies.

True confidence comes from visibility, knowing not just when a project will be delivered, but how it is progressing at every stage.

The industry is now witnessing a shift towards process-driven, technology-enabled construction.

Digital planning tools, centralised knowledge centres, real-time project tracking, and milestone-based execution frameworks are helping reduce uncertainty at the design and build stages.

Standardisation – whether in design, procurement, or execution – allows developers to minimise variability and control costs. Modern construction methods such as prefabrication and modular components further improve speed and accuracy, reducing dependency on manual labour and on-site improvisation.

Value multiplier

One of the most powerful ways to mitigate value risk is transparency. Tech-enabled construction platforms that provide real-time progress tracking, cost visibility, and clear communication help align all stakeholders: developers, contractors, lenders, and buyers.

When timelines are predictable, and progress is measurable, financing becomes more efficient, buyer confidence improves, and asset valuations stabilise.

Construction is a key contributor to India's GDP and employment.

Persistent delays slow housing supply, strain financial systems through stressed assets, and impact allied industries. Improving execution certainty is therefore not just a sectoral need but an economic imperative.

By embracing structured planning, technology-driven execution, and buyer-centric transparency, the sector can move away from uncertainty-led value erosion towards delivery-led value creation. In India's next phase of real estate growth, predictability will define profitability.

The area had to set itself apart from the traditional museum template. “Our biggest challenge during ideation was the irregular shape of the plan, and how best to create a meditative space that would immediately offer visitors an oasis of calm from the crowds outside. We also moved away from the museum as a space for artefacts, to a more sensorial experience,” Puri explains.

The 18-room museum starts with a stark grey undulating reception where seats seem to mushroom from the cavernous walls, and the floor flows into the structure as easily as the ceiling encasing it.

“We decided on one seamless space, one material, one palette. So, we chose to create a 2,000-sq.ft. open reception with a singular table-like surface that grows out from the floor, and seats along the perimeter. With simple track lighting that peeks out at intervals within the ceiling, it’s effi-

Museum as meditative escape

What is nanoconcrete?

Flexstone provided the surface application. Its FlexNano Coating System®, a hybrid polymer modified coating (composed of liquid polymers, hardeners, specific aggregates, and a water-based resin mixture), was used to cover the entire surface of the museum. A uniform coating of up to 2mm was applied without joints (grouting) on the floors, ceilings, roofs, and walls. The coating is a no-VOC (Volatile Organic Compound), water-based solution so there is no fear of strong aromas or oily surfaces tarnishing the sensorial experience within the space.

cient without being overwhelming,” he says. Tall grey columns lead the eye to the corridor ahead, while the entire area is designed to mimic organic forms in a single tone. “Grey was better than white for the museum. It does not show dirt, is not as stark as black, and yet is an ideal vehicle for the floor-to-ceiling projections across all the rooms,” he adds.

The nanoconcrete (a hybrid polymer coating applied over a solid framework to provide smooth, flowing surfaces) is seamless, so there are no lines on the floor, and the museum’s visuals flow beautifully across all surfaces. To create the finish, wire mesh was moulded on site. Insulation was then added for better sound absorption, followed by a nano-concrete layer by Flexstone to complete the look. “The entire project took just six months,” says Puri.

To allow visitors to dwell in complete silence and enter a meditative state, the reception is shorn of ornamentation or foliage. “This was intentional. We did not want anything to distract the visitor, so there’s this absence of sensory over-

Views of Aatma Manthan Museum; and (bottom) Sanjay Puri. (SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT)

Global recognition

Sanjay Puri has been on the jury of the World Architecture Festival since 2010, and is the first Indian architect to serve on it. The firm has won over 475 awards, including 350 international design awards, and been no. 32 on Archello’s list of Top 100 Architects Worldwide.

estate. First, visuals appear only on the walls; in the second room they cover the walls and ceiling; by the third, the walls, floor, and ceiling immerse visitors in nature.

“The rooms gradually add more sensory cues – visuals and audio. Botanical imagery, floating space rocks, crystals arising from the floor, all these visuals are accompanied by soothing auditory cues. That’s where having a seamless nano-concrete surface is the perfect canvas,” explains Puri.

He adds, “Every audio-visual experience is carefully curated. Totally, this walk takes around 15-20 minutes, and only 10-15 visitors are allowed at a time.” The timing allows people to rest at each space, slowly building on the immersive experience. “The set number of visitors per batch is ensured for safety and occupancy limits within the spaces, the size of the rooms, and to stave off a feeling of overcrowding.”

The playlist in the museum is designed to play on a loop, with acoustics by Sonosphere Acoustic Design Consulting. Axis Three Dee Studios Pvt. created the audio-visual displays. “The experience is largely a sensory journey. Creating these kinds of public spaces is a great experience,” states Puri.

The Aatma Manthan Museum explores natural organic forms and movement while employing technology to distinguish itself from the ornamental palaces and formidable forts seen across the state of Rajasthan. The intentional absence of ‘design motifs’ allows visitors to focus on the visuals, the cool surfaces they sit on, and the soft sounds that surround them. The lighting, acoustic design, material curation and spatial structure all work in tandem, to set the museum apart from others in the space. Here, the only voice guiding your meditation, is the voice within.

When a piece of furniture tells a story, you listen. Chacko's Mehfil, a wall-mounted grotto-style decorative cabinet, renders three endangered species from the Indian subcontinent: the sarus crane, the lion-tailed macaque and the golden mahseer. The creatures, crafted in intricate marquetry and brass inlay in natural wood, may seem unusual on a cabinet. But that is precisely what Chacko seeks to do with its furniture –tell a story, provoke thought and add meaning to a space.

Vipin Joe, the founder of the Mumbai-based design studio Chacko, wants to create purposeful pieces that are full of character. As a designer, he is open to influences, Joe says. And the making of each piece is often collaborative – a dialogue with artists, illustrators and fellow designers who share his sensibilities.

Hand-painted arts

In Mehfil, for instance, the animals are illustrated by Italian artist Gaia Elloe Cairo, who specialises in hand-painted decorative arts to create awareness about nature and science. The marquetry is executed by Sampigé & Co, a marquetry studio in Mysuru.

Joe constantly explores material and mood to figure out what his crafted furniture brand Chacko could be.

The Native Console was born thus. A collaboration with his friend, designer, illustrator and projection artist Nikunj Patel of Studio Moebius,

An exercise in symmetry

the Chettinad-inspired console was conceived as a piece to be placed behind the sofa, but it went much beyond its scope. “I was having tea with Nikunj; we were sharing thoughts and we were both taken by the idea of a piece that would be a blend of industrial and traditional craft,” says Joe.

The Native Console, he adds, is his favourite. “It has a bit of everything: mid-century Tanjore and Madras in etched brass, teak and stone. An iteration of the console appears in the collection, shaped as a mid-century stereo box, named ‘Yashodha’s Dream’, which depicts playful scenes of Lord Krishna’s Vrindavan. Made in teak, rosewood and aged etched brass, this richly detailed piece comes in both 8-foot and 6-foot versions.

The setting of the studio, in an industrial estate in Kandivali, is an advantage, says Joe. “Our studio is surrounded by people working machinery. The brass etching for these pieces was done by someone who makes badges. It is lovely being in an industrial estate.”
