Low-VOC materials such as laminates and plywood can reduce the chemical load inside homes. (SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT)

Sunalini Esther

The pandemic hit, and suddenly masks were mandatory. Fast forward a few years – the pandemic was over, thankfully, but the prominence of masks lingered. We understood that they were an effective filter against pollutants in our air, chemical or microbial.

Should you suffer from allergies, you could wear them to work. Many architects now keep a spare mask around because they effectively shield them from sawdust and cement dust during site visits.

VOCs, a nemesis indoors

When we step inside our homes, though, we presume things are well. That's not true. Volatile Organic Compounds (VOCs) are the nemesis of indoor air quality. Paints, fabrics and most interior design materials release VOCs – so

Are your interiors making you sick?

A guide to using non-toxic materials in home design to promote good health metimes for months, even years – resulting in headaches, respiratory trouble, fatigue, skin irritation. Over time, continued exposure can lead to worsening allergies or asthma, and persistent respiratory discomfort. Some VOCs, such as formaldehyde, are also classified as human carcinogens under prolonged and high exposure. Their impact is amplified in poorly ventilated spaces.

Factor in heat and humidity in cities like Chennai, and the release of VOCs can be accelerated. That's why people fall sick in some places. Ergo, the term, sick buildings.

Sam Chopra

There was a time, not so long ago, when a ₹10 crore house made heads turn. It meant something. It whispered of old money, of a certain kind of gravity, a Lutyens bungalow perhaps, or a sprawling plot somewhere in South Delhi where the trees were older than the city's ambitions. Beyond that number, real estate almost ceased to be a transaction. It became mythology.

That mythology has been rewritten. India's super-luxury residential market has quietly crossed a threshold that even its most bullish observers didn't see coming quite this fast. The new benchmark isn't ₹10 crore. It isn't even ₹25 or ₹50 crore. Today, the conversation that matters, the one happening in hushed tones over single malts at rooftop bars, is the ₹100 crore home. And what's striking isn't just the price tag. It's what the price tag now gets you, and more importantly, who's buying it.

Moving forward

The idea that true luxury meant low-rise living, a private garden, a driveway, a gate you could close on the world, held for decades. Bungalows in Lutyens' Delhi and sea-facing bungalows in Juhu defined aspiration for a generation of industrialists and inherited wealth. But that generation is no longer the only one at the table.

Today's ₹100 crore homes aren't bungalows. They're sky-high residences sitting on the upper floors of towers that have been engineered to feel like nothing else exists at that altitude. We're talking floor plates of 8,000 to 12,000 square feet. Private pools on the terrace. Wine cellars tucked behind library walls. Smart home systems that adjust the temperature of your whiskey glass, if you'll permit the exaggeration.

GETTY IMAGES/ISTOCKPHOTO

The amenities aren't amenities anymore; they're addresses within addresses. Concierge services modelled on the finest hotels in the world. Private cinema rooms. Wellness floors. Helipads, yes, but also herb gardens and meditation pods, because the people buying these homes are not just rich – they are restless, curious, and relentlessly alive.

A different kind of buyer

The bungalow gave you space. These towers give you everything else, too. If there is one phrase that has quietly transformed the character of India's ultra-luxury housing market, it is this: by invitation only.

When developers started restricting access to certain projects, not just through price, but through genuine vetting, something shifted. The homes became more exclusive, yes.

But more importantly, the community inside them changed. Gone is the old guard's monopoly. In its place walks a different kind of buyer: the 35-year-old founder who took his startup public, the couple in their early 40s who built a D2C brand from a garage in Gurugram and sold it for a number nobody expected, the young entrepreneur who thinks in quarters but lives for decades. These buyers don't want a home that feels like a museum; they want one that feels like fuel. A space where the energy of what they've built follows them through the front door. They're not retiring into luxury – they're accelerating into it.

Inside India's ₹100 crore homes

How young entrepreneurs, new wealth, and sky-high towers are reshaping the country's idea of luxury living

Today's ₹100 crore homes aren't bungalows. They're sky-high residences sitting on the upper floors of towers that have been engineered to feel like nothing else exists at that altitude.

Ask anyone in Indian real estate where the pulse of the ₹100 crore market beats loudest today, and the answer, increasingly, is Gurugram. Specifically, Golf Course Road, a corridor that has done for Indian luxury real estate what the Bandra-Kurla Complex did for finance: turned a geographical stretch into a state of mind. Or, to put it better, what Sheikh Zayed Road is to Dubai is what Golf Course Road is to India.

An expansion

Mumbai's MMR has always been the benchmark. It was, for the longest time, India's only credible ultra-luxury market. Even a decade ago, transactions crossing ₹100 crore in MMR weren't unheard of. But the distribution has shifted meaningfully. In 2025, the city's luxury real estate market continued to push new highs. Plix co-founder Rishubh Satiya purchased a ₹125 crore apartment at Oberoi 360 West in Worli, while Piramal Realty closed multiple deals exceeding ₹100 crore, including penthouses and duplex residences at its Piramal Mahalaxmi project in South Mumbai.

Bengaluru is still some distance away from that benchmark. Even some of the city's most high-profile transactions recently remain well below the ₹100 crore mark. For instance, a luxury duplex penthouse at MAIA Estates' 27 Summit project was acquired by Market Financial Solutions CEO Paresht Raja for ₹54.38 crore or Infosys founder N.R. Narayana Murthy purchased a second apartment in the same project for over ₹50 crore in late 2024.

At the same time, Gurugram has not just caught up, it has pulled ahead. At DLF Camellias, the tower that has, over the last few years, quietly become shorthand for the very ceiling of Indian residential luxury, the transactions have started writing their own history. Entrepreneur Rishi Parti closed what is believed to be the highest-ever residential transaction in Gurugram here, at a staggering ₹190 crore, a number that didn't just set a record but announced, in no uncertain terms, that Camellias was operating in a category of its own.

Value over vanity

Strip away the superlatives and what you're left with is a simple observation: the ₹100 crore home in India today is not a vanity purchase. It is a considered, often deeply strategic decision made by people who have spent their careers understanding the difference between price and value.

What they are buying is extraordinary real estate, space that rivals what you'd find in Dubai or Singapore, finishes that compete with anything in London's super-prime market, amenities that have redefined what residential living can mean in this country. But they are also buying community. Proximity to people who are building, thinking, and creating at the same altitude. In a country where the network is everything, the floor you live on has started to matter in ways that extend well beyond the view. Today's luxury is no longer just about exclusivity, but exclusivity with excellence.

That, perhaps, is the most interesting thing about the ₹100 crore club. The door is open, but only for those who know what they're walking into.

The writer is president and country head, eXp Realty India.

“Sick buildings are an actual scientific concern. Awareness of designing for indoor air quality, however, is quite limited,” says Monsingh Devadas, sustainability expert and former dean, School of Architecture & Planning, Anna University. “Aligning government frameworks such as the Energy Conservation and Sustainable Building Code [ECSBC] and Eco Niwas Samhita [ENS 2024] with architectural education is essential to equip future design professionals.”

Painting a new picture

In home interiors, the material that covers the largest surface area is paint. Conventionally, while the scent of a newly painted home can feel ‘fresh’, the evaporation of VOCs into the interiors contributes to that characteristic sweet scent.

Today, almost all major market players offer low-VOC/zero-VOC options as wellness variants. Nippon Paint offers an anti-formaldehyde paint that helps make the air fresher by absorbing harmful free formaldehyde from the air and embedding it in a polymer backbone. “We’ve used this across different project sectors, including healthcare spaces [YRG Care Centre], specifically operating theatres within hospitals, commercial spaces [SHELL corporate office], hospitality spaces [The Hablis Hotel] and government projects as well,” says Sneha Alex Pillai, national specifier engagement, Nippon Paint India.

A simple shift in the specification of interior paint can contribute to a significant reduction in chemical release within a room. In the same vein, low-VOC choices in plywood, laminates and wallpapers add to smart choices in interior design.

On solid ground

Flooring is an important aspect of how we experience a space because we are almost always in physical contact with it. Hard surfaces such as vitrified tiles offer beautiful aesthetics but can be unforgiving underfoot over time. Traditional materials such as red oxide, Athangudi tiles, terracotta and Kota (a softer stone) offer a compelling middle ground.

They are breathable, climate-responsive, and often gentler on the joints compared to highly vitrified surfaces. “We’ve used Athangudi tiles for around 15 years in our projects and our clients have consistently remarked that they are able to walk on them without experiencing the kind of pain typically associated with walking on vitrified tiles,” notes Anupama Mohanram from Chennai-based sustainable architecture firm Green Evolution.

While carpets might immediately spring to mind as a comfortable option, in humid environments like Chennai, it is advisable to avoid fully carpeted floors. A workable solution would be to layer a sturdy, low-emission base with rugs to improve comfort. Opt for loose, breathable textiles that can be cleaned and aired regularly. “In my previous home, I had an enormous Mirzapur carpet in my living room. Maintenance was a nightmare,” recalls Joseph Vijaykar, a retired homeowner based in Chennai. “It attracted dust, mites and mould. I now prefer to place washable area rugs in spaces where I tend to walk the most.”

Furnish with care

Furnishings are typically categorised as design choices over health choices, and understandably so. However, they exert measurable influence on indoor air quality, comfort, and long-term well-being. Materials such as cotton, linen, wool, and silk are inherently breathable and climate-responsive, as opposed to synthetic alternatives. This is particularly important in warm, humid climates because it helps reduce dampness, which in turn limits conditions that allow mould and mildew to develop.

However, even natural fabrics are sometimes treated for wrinkle resistance, stain protection, or durability. A simple solution is to wash new fabrics before use, especially curtains, cushion covers, and upholstery where possible. This can help reduce residual chemical treatments.

Trouble with adhesives

Now, we come to an invisible yet significant layer. Even when material choices seem safe, what binds them together may not be. Adhesives used in joinery, wallpaper, and flooring can release VOCs. While these are less visible, they contribute considerably to indoor air quality. Requesting low-VOC adhesives and sealants from your contractor is a small but meaningful step towards enhancing your well-being indoors.

While a strong case has been made for promoting health in interior design, there remains a primary challenge that needs to be navigated to see a measurable difference within interior environments: the lack of awareness regarding healthier interior material alternatives. “I would experience extreme physical discomfort if a space were recently painted. I was not aware this was due to VOCs,” says Jebaraja, vice president of an IT company. “Once I was informed of a low-VOC option for paint, I did not hesitate to choose that for my ongoing home renovation.”

The next prevalent challenge is the availability of skilled labour, as healthy alternatives usually involve labour-intensive processes. By extension, they are also expensive. Mohanram says, “Oxide floor laying or Athangudi tile production, though better for our homes than vitrified tiles, consume time and require proper training for labour. This also applies to traditional lime plaster, which is healthier than cement plaster. These issues can be sorted with awareness, though.”

Whether in the workplace or at home, studies reveal that we spend around 90% of our time indoors. Hence, while practical aesthetics is certainly at the core of decision-making in interior design, choices that impact health and well-being should have the final say. The next time you sit with your interior designer, make sure they are not just designing a beautiful home, but one that enables a healthy life, too.
