Building for tomorrow

Ahead of World Environment Day, real estate industry voices reflect on sustainability, resilience, and adapting to climate challenges

J. Jeffrin Jeba Paulin

With rising sea levels and intensifying urban heat across cities, climate change is no longer just a subject of discussion – it's time for meaningful action and long-term planning. Concerns around heat islands, waterlogging and development in environmentally vulnerable areas are increasingly shaping real estate investment decisions. Climate risk is also beginning to influence property prices, valuations and buyer preferences across the market. In 2026, homebuyers are looking beyond location and amenities, taking into account green mandates, sustainable building practices and climate resilience before investing in property.

Ahead of World Environment Day on June 5, industry experts share their insights.

Luxury housing

The meaning of luxury housing has undergone a quiet transformation. For many years, luxury was evaluated through address, scale, finishes, views, and amenities. Those will continue to matter, but they are no longer enough. A home that cannot stay comfortable, resource-efficient, and liveable over time will struggle to remain truly luxurious. Bengaluru's original luxury was never only built form. It was its climate, tree cover, lakes, shaded streets, gardens and a certain ease of everyday life. As the city becomes warmer, denser, and more stretched on water and infrastructure, future-ready luxury will be defined by how intelligently a home works with nature: orientation, shade, natural ventilation, daylight, water recharge, reuse systems and durable materials.

PAVAN KUMAR
Founder & CEO, White Lotus Group

Hospitality

Hospitality design is no longer centred only on aesthetics or luxury, it is increasingly about resilience, adaptability and environmental intelligence. Across the sector, we are witnessing a strong shift towards climate-responsive architecture that integrates passive cooling, natural ventilation, water-sensitive landscaping, renewable energy systems and biophilic elements into the guest experience. Sustainability is now influencing core design thinking, from material selection and energy optimisation to local craftsmanship and thermal efficiency.

liabilities. The sector can lead by example, turning lobbies into climate action statements and leases into sustainability contracts. Adaptation isn't optional anymore; it's the new rent.

Commercial

The priorities of commercial real estate in India are being rapidly reshaped owing to climate change. Today, sustainability is no longer an option but a key business imperative driving design, construction, and operations. Occupiers and investors are increasingly preferring green, energy-efficient, and climate-resilient developments that align with long-term ESG goals. Features such as efficient water management, lower carbon footprint, and wellness-focused infrastructure are becoming critical differentiators. Going forward, sustainable commercial assets will command stronger demand, better value creation, and long-term resilience.

Urban landscape

Climate change is rewriting the rules of real estate, like not in a distant future, but right now. Rising sea levels, extreme heat, and flooding are no longer just distant threats, they are real valuation factors. We're watching a seismic shift: properties without resilience features are starting to feel like stranded assets. Buyers now ask about flood zones, cooling costs, and even grid independence before they care too much about square footage. Green certification isn't a luxury — it's more of a risk metric. The industry has to retrofit

Property market

Commercial real estate is dealing with a two part problem too: operational carbon and tenant expectations, both at the same time. Offices and malls in fire prone or flood risk zones are seeing insurance spikes and then vacancy rises, sometimes pretty quickly. Tenants want energy efficient HVAC, solar readiness, and water recycling. Climate disclosure rules are now tangling with leasing and financing decisions. We're urging developers to prioritise net-zero retrofits; otherwise, even prime locations can become Delhi-NCR real estate investors need to understand government regulations, mortgage processes and interest rate movements to succeed in the fast-growing Indian property market. The infrastructure development of the Delhi-Mumbai Expressway and RRTS expansions will create new investment opportunities in Greater Noida West and Dwarka Expressway through its time-based financing decisions.

The Real Estate (Regulation and Development) Act, 2016 (RERA) serves as the main law requiring developers to register their projects with state authorities such as UPRERA in Noida-Greater Noida and HRERA in Gurugram. The system protects investors from project delays and fraudulent activities through its requirement to disclose approval processes, project timelines and ownership details. The Credit Linked Subsidy Scheme (CLSS) provides interest subsidies to affordable and middle-income groups through Pradhan Mantri Awas Yojana (PMAY), which continues its subsidies until 2026, thereby increasing buyer access and stabilising the entire market.

Smart borrowing

Investors who want to achieve optimal returns should evaluate loan-to-value (LTV) ratios, which the RBI regulates between 75% and 80% because this requires them to make a minimum down

Decoding NCR realty: Rates, rules and returns

From RERA regulations to repo-linked loans, here’s what investors need to know before entering Delhi-NCR’s fast-evolving property market payment of 20% to 25%, which applies to luxury properties in Gurugram and South Delhi. The most beneficial option for loans is floating rates, which link to Repo-Linked Lending Rate (RLLR) and Marginal Cost of Lending Rate (MCLR) because customers who negotiate their bank spread between 2% and 3% will save thousands of rupees throughout their loan period. The costs increase because processing fees, which range from 0.25% to 1% of the loan amount, and prepayment penalties exist, but customers who maintain a credit score above 750 will receive better loan conditions from lenders such as SBI and HDFC. The tax advantages provided by Sections 24(b) and 80C create additional benefits for investors who choose to invest in the National Capital Region.

The RBI maintains its current repo rate of 5.25% since February 2026 after implementing 125 basis point reductions during 2025 which creates economic stability through ongoing robust economic development and active inflation management.

The NCR home loan rates between 7.2% and 9.5% per annum enable prime borrowers to achieve lower EMIs while buying mid-range and luxury homes. The current interest rates enable key micro-markets to achieve price growth between 6% and 10% while generating rental yields between 5% and 8%. Investors must pay attention to the marginal propensity to consume (MPC) meetings because these meetings determine future changes, which depend on inflation rates and international market conditions.

Risk planning

The most effective way to succeed through RERA-registered projects enables you to reduce risks associated with construction projects which exist in developing areas. The budget should allocate 25% to 30% for initial costs, which should include a stamp duty charge of 6% to 7%, to achieve smooth financing processes. The current market environment requires borrowers to assess their financial requirements by negotiating spreads and fees, while lenders offer floating rates based on the 5.25% repo rate.

The Dwarka Expressway area provides investment opportunities which will grow because of PMAY demand and infrastructure development. The final step requires you to work with advisors who will help you maximise tax deductions while selecting loans that match your financial goals. Investors in NCR can achieve high returns by understanding the policy-loan-rate system, which prepares them for upcoming market growth.

Industrial

Industrial facilities are more susceptible to stress from climate change: intense heat reducing the efficiency of machines, extreme weather that interferes with supply chains, and water shortages that disrupt the ability to keep production continuous, among other issues. Relocating plants away from the coasts and investing in passive cooling, on-site renewable energy storage, and climate-resilient water systems may become necessary. These issues that used to be occasional problems are now becoming long-term, persistent problems. The goals have shifted to climate change resilient design, more energy-efficient systems, integrated renewable energy systems, better water resource management, and design principles for long-term viability.

SHASHANK GUPTA
Director, RPS Group

Retail

Retail property is hyper-sensitive to climate shocks. One flood or a heatwave can shut stores down for weeks, and it does more than just pause revenue, it also grinds brand trust. We're reworking shopping centres with permeable pavements, shaded parking areas, and those backup microgrids that quietly keep running. The location game is also flipping, kind of, moving away from low lying zones and toward climate stable corridors where stuff doesn't get wrecked as easily. Retail real estate really has to treat climate resilience as a core leasing clause, where landlords and tenants split the retrofit costs. Otherwise, the alternative is stranded strip malls, empty and stubborn. Shoppers will, in practice, walk with their feet to places that stay cool stay dry, and stay open. Resilience is the new curb appeal, basically.

Building for tomorrow

Infrastructure

HARDIK SHAH
Director, Shyam Group-Dholera SIR

Infrastructure is the skeleton of real estate: roads, sewers, power lines, transit. Climate change fractures that skeleton, heat buckles rails, storms overload drainage and rising seas just inundate tunnels. Real estate can't really work without resilient infrastructure. The infrastructure planning should slide away from historical weather and move forward toward climate models. This means raised substations, porous pavement and decentralised energy storage, to be done early. Every real estate rupee saved by green building can get wiped out by one failed bridge. Hence, infrastructure and real estate have to co-invest in adaptation.

Institutional

lobbying and also sharing climate data across portfolios. Institutions don't simply "own" buildings; they carry the obligation to adapt them. If we keep waiting, that looks like a breach of trust.

KESHAV MANGLA
GM-Business Development, Fortesia Realty

Warehouse

Warehouses are like climate canaries. When temperatures keep climbing, cold storage gets squeezed; heavy rains chew up roofs and loading docks, and the whole logistics routine kind of wobbles. We're boosting distribution centers, throwing on cool roofs, and leaning into predictive analytics for weather related closures. This sector has to standardise resilience audits. Solar powered warehouses, plus battery backup, are getting treated as non-negotiable by big retailers.

SIDDHARTH MAURYA
Founder & Managing Director, Vibhvangal Anukulakara Private Limited
